called at the White House to discuss sugar trust affairs with President Roosevelt. He was received cordially. The two men had not met since they left Harvard. "Did your career at Harvard do you any good?" the President asked Mr. Earle.

'Oh, I don't know," was the reply. Mr. Roosevelt, according to Mr. Earle, then began to quote Latin.

"It seemed very silly for the President of the United States to be giving me a lesson in Latin, so I smiled," said Mr.

"'I see you understand," the President observed. But I did not understand then and I do not understand now." "When I went into the White House I thought Roosevelt was the greatest man in the universe," said Mr. Earle. "People in Kansas still think so, I believe." the witness added, grinning at Representative Madison of that State.

Mr. Earle's criticism of former President Roosevelt aroused Mr. Madison, who said that the President relied on Attorney General Bonaparte for advice and that there was no evidence that the President acted from improper motives in the sugar

In telling the history of the Pennsylvania Sugar Refining Company case Mr. Earle touched on the tragic results. the death of Gustave Kissel, the suicide of Frank Hipple and the collapse of Adolph Segal. Mr. Segal later followed Mr. Earle on the stand.

An interesting feature of the session today was an objection made by Chairman Hardwick to questions that T. S. Fuller, counsel for the American company attempted to ask Mr. Segal. The result was that the committee went into executive session to determine its policy relative to the appearance of counsel. The committee decided that attorneys representing any interest involved could ask questions through the committee, such questions to be put if they met with the approval of the committee.

Asked to throw more light on his nego tiations with President Roosevelt about the sugar case, Mr. Earle said:

You remember the story of the black man who was asked where he got the chicken, and he said: 'If you're a friend of the black man, don't ask me.' If you're a friend of Mr. Roosevelt, don't

"This is a quorum of fair play," observed Mr. Hinds

Well, so far as the Chief Executive is concerned. I had warned the President that valuable documents in this case were about to disappear and it was hard for me to believe that it was right to delay action in this case," responded Mr. Larie.

"Isn't it a fact," said Representative Madison of Kansas, "that Attorney-General Moody had passed on a similar issue as in that case and decided, just as Mr. Bonaparte later did, that the conditions of the Knight case prevailed in this acce?"

"Not if Mr. Moody tells the truth, which I am sure he did," answered Mr. Earle.

Mr. Earle showed a good deal of bitterness over the report made to President Roosevelt by Attorney-General Bonaparte in which it was held that the evidence did not justify a prosecution of the sugar trust. Representative Madison rushed to the defence of Col. Roosevelt, asying he was one of the folks from Kansas who believed in the integrity and good intention of Roosevelt. The witness insisted that both President Rocsevelt and Attorney-General Bonaparte were derelict in their duty so far as the sugar trust was concerned.

This officer was Milten D. Purdy, the Roosevelt trust buster. Whether Mr. Purdy made a report to President Roosevelt the witness could not say, but he had reason to believe that Roosevelt knew of Mr. Purdy's views. "I have never criticised Roosevelt for Bonaparte's ignorance," observed the witness. "However, he should have had a good lawyer in the office of Attorney-General."

Asked to explain the motive of the resident in failing to prosecute the sugar rust Mr. Earle replied: "Oh, I shouldn't be forced to answer that question. You gentlemen know whom Mr. Roosevelt had around him. He may have had one motive and he may have had another."

A question put by Chairman Hardwick led to a lively tariff debate among the committeemen. Mr. Hardwick, who hails from Georgia and is a Democrat, expressed it as his belief that free trade in sugar would be a good thing for the consumer. Representative Malby of New York, a standpatter, took the other side of the argument. The committee debate lasted fifteen minutes.
